Karst terrain = possible caves, including underground with no surface exit

Nearby Cave

While the back yard of a home on Ganymede just south of Parmer (about 1.5 miles from the Oak Creek site) was being dug out for a pool, the pool company discovered a significant cave that extends in one direction underneath the house and out the other direction to the neighbor's yard. Underground voids like this are common in karst and can add significantly to the building costs for multistory structures.
